Short Behaviour Programme

A young person who was on the verge of becoming a persistent offender was offered a more intensive programme to look at his behaviour, friends and attitude.

During the work it was evident there were difficulties in school and at home partly due to his short attention span.

I met with the appropriate person at school and a support package was put in place for him. Social worker also worked with the young person regarding his low self-esteem.

Slow but steady progress was being made and before the work was completed supports were put in place to allow his change in behaviour to continue

I have monitored his behaviour over the past seven months and there has been no further offending.
